To Whom It May Concern,

I am writing to recommend Belén Cereijo Silva, whom I supervised during her internship in the Advanced Analytics department at Management Solutions, where she was assigned to our team supporting a major banking client. Belén joined initially as an extracurricular intern in July and continued into her curricular internship from September through January, remaining with the team into March to consolidate her work. Her role involved contributing to ongoing analytical processes for our SME-focused team, combining data processing, reporting, and direct client interaction.

From early on, Belén stood out for her professionalism and reliability in day-to-day work. Our team ran with deliverables that were expected to meet a high standard every time, and Belén consistently met that bar, managing multiple responsibilities within a limited working window. She also showed a genuine, proactive curiosity about the business beyond her immediate tasks, participating in her colleagues' lines of work when she had spare time.

That same reliability showed up in how she handled more difficult moments. When her project partner moved to another part of the project, Belén took full responsibility for a complex analysis that required combining multiple data sources and working directly with the client, a task she initially found demanding, but one she structured and delivered independently, developing a more precise and confident way of working in the process. On a separate occasion, when her team needed to investigate an issue with a data source managed by another department, Belén proactively organised and led a meeting with that team to get to the bottom of it, without being asked to, simply because she recognised it would move the work forward faster. She was equally attentive to detail and judgement in how she communicated her findings, adjusting a report after client feedback showed it was too technical for its intended audience.

These qualities go well beyond technical data work, and I would describe them as consulting qualities in the fullest sense: reliability under real client pressure, sound judgement about when to take initiative and when to ask, and a level of ownership that made her someone I trusted with tasks of real consequence to the project. In her final evaluation, I specifically noted her adaptability, organisation, curiosity and autonomy, and how quickly she adapted to a demanding technical environment despite coming from a more functional academic background. Based on my direct experience working with her, I would recommend Belén for professional opportunities across consulting and financial services more broadly; she combines a strong professional attitude with the discipline to deliver, and I believe those qualities would serve her well beyond a purely technical or data-focused role.

Kind regards,
